In this capstone course for Reli majors, we will explore and/or deepen our understanding of the relationship between sex, sexuality, and religion. Why do religious traditions and communities have anything to say about sex? What are they saying about it? To account for the importance of context, historical, geographical, social, and political, we will focus our explorations on the United States in the 20th and 21st centuries, and consider discourses and practices in Jewish, Christian, and Muslim communities. How do religious communities in a secular context negotiate questions of sexual ethics, sexual diversity, sex education, and sexual abuse? How do factors such as patriarchal structures, religious hierarchies, religious authority, community building, and textual interpretation affect religious norms as well as experiences of religious individuals?
